Information-Led Policing: Progress and Problems

8:45 am - 10:15 am

Plenary Session

Salons I/II/III

This plenary highlights NIJ's use of technology development and social science research to help police work more efficiently in the face of shrinking budgets and growing demands for service. It brings together dynamic speakers whose experience spans cutting-edge police leadership, development of technologies that mine and analyze data, and bringing knowledge to top leaders in a usable form. Together, these speakers will shed light on this important problem and discuss what has been – and should be--done to aid the move toward information-led policing.

This forward-looking plenary discusses the likely impact of social, demographic, and technological change on crime and justice four decades from now. Each of the speakers brings substantial practical and scholarly experience to bear on predicting the challenges and opportunities that face the United States as its older, more diverse, and more interconnected population adapts to new technologies, new crimes, and new ways to understand and control one of humankind's oldest problems – crime.
